

Andy Stavros

Advisory Member — Independent Researcher & Land Historian

Andy Stavros is a father, a longtime Orange County real estate professional, and — by his own admission — someone too stubborn to walk away from an unanswered question.

Andy lives in Newport Beach, but Ladera Ranch is anything but distant to him: close friends call it home, and he has served clients here throughout his career. When he learned what some Ladera families were facing, he reached out and offered to help. He believed the skills he'd spent a lifetime building — investigating properties, tracing records, and solving complex problems — could genuinely make a difference.

For the past two years, working nights and weekends, Andy has been researching historical archives — original government records, historical aerial imagery, maps, and land-use documents — using modern AI-assisted analysis to reconstruct the history of the land this community is built on. That documented, carefully sourced archive now supports ProtectLadera's push for independent environmental testing and real answers for families.

His rule is simple: no conclusions before measurement — follow the evidence wherever it leads, and report it honestly.

President of the Stavros Group at Douglas Elliman, Andy holds a degree in Finance, Real Estate and Law. His most important title here, though, is the one that got him involved: a dad who wanted to help other families.

Short version (for card layouts)

A Newport Beach father with deep ties to Ladera Ranch — close friends who live here and clients he's served for years. When he learned what local families were facing, Andy reached out to help, spending two years researching historical archives with AI-assisted analysis to reconstruct the history of this land. His documented research archive now supports the push for independent testing. His rule: no conclusions before measurement.
