

Andy Stavros

Advisory Member — Independent Researcher & Land Historian

Andy Stavros is a father, a longtime Orange County real estate professional, and — by his own admission — someone too stubborn to walk away from an unanswered question.

Andy lives in Newport Beach, but Ladera Ranch is anything but distant to him: close friends call it home, and he has served clients here throughout his career. When he learned what some Ladera families were facing, he couldn't look away. He believed the skills he'd spent a lifetime building — investigating properties, tracing records, and solving complex problems — could genuinely help.

Over the past two years, working nights and weekends, Andy has used archival research, historical aerial imagery, mapping, and AI-assisted data modeling to reconstruct the history of the land this community is built on — assembling a documented, carefully sourced research archive that now supports the push for independent environmental testing and real answers.

His rule is simple: no conclusions before measurement — follow the evidence wherever it leads, and report it honestly.

President of the Stavros Group at Douglas Elliman, Andy holds a degree in Finance, Real Estate and Law. His most important title here, though, is the one that got him involved: a dad who wanted to help other families.

Short version (for card layouts)

A Newport Beach father and lifelong problem-solver with deep ties to Ladera Ranch — close friends who live here and clients he's served for years. Moved by what local families were facing, Andy spent two years using archival research, historical imagery, and AI-assisted modeling to reconstruct the history of this land, building the research archive now supporting the push for independent testing. His rule: no conclusions before measurement.

One-liner

A father and independent researcher who put AI-era investigative tools to work for Ladera's families — and won't stop until they have real answers.
